Other remarks	Hidehiko Sazanami, who used to work for University of Tsukuba as a professor at Department of Policy and Planning Sciences, had contributed to the development of Japanese modern city planning throughout his life, after WWII. The whole list of his collection about city planning in and out of Japan was completed as a database to be accessible by researchers. The collection includes some old books of early 1900s, documents related to the recovery plan after WWII, and lots of literature on international city planning.
